Why The Lion Is King

MONROE MONKEY was having fun. He was sliding down the "banister" made by Gerald Giraffe's long neck. Elmer Elephant was in on it, too. He was the one who hoisted Monroe up again with his trunk at the end of the ride. Gerald was enjoying himself, too, because he had a sore throat, and the rub-down Monroe gave it each time he slid down did it good.

"More fun than a barrel of monkeys," said Elmer, as he tossed Monroe high in the air.

"Whee!" yelled Monroe, with all four hands outstretched to grab a branch.

"Ha-ha-ha!" laughed Gerald Giraffe, as Monroe zoomed down. "You tickled me that time!"

Another voice broke in on the merriment.

"What's all the giggling and carrying-on about? Humph! Grown animals acting like a passel of kids!" grumbled Pat Parrot.

"That's what I think, too," said a deep voice.

All turned to look at Leo Lion, who had quietly come up to watch the fun. Monroe, Elmer, and Gerald stopped and stared and then wiped the smiles off their faces. They felt a little guilty being caught playing such a silly game by Leo Lion.

"Relax, kids," said Leo when he saw their faces drop. "I was only fooling. As a matter of fact, I like to have my fun, too, but everybody thinks I play too rough. Look—here's a trick I learned from a cousin of mine who's got a soft job in the circus."

Leo Lion promptly stood on his head.

"Marvelous, wonderful, colossal!" said Monroe, Elmer, and Gerald.

"Ridiculous!" said Pat Parrot. "Where's your dignity?"

"I wasn't standing on my dignity," said Leo. "I was standing on my head."

"Tut, tut," said Pat. "From you one rather expects more self-respect, pride, stateliness. After all, aren't you the King of the Jungle?"

"Oh-oh," said Leo, winking at the others, "here we go again. All together, boys—one, two, three!"

Elmer, Gerald, Monroe, and Leo recited in unison. . . .

"Please tell us, Pat Parrot, why the Lion is King of the Jungle."

"Humph!" grunted Pat. "I've a good mind not to say a word . . . but as long as the King and his Royal Jesters have commanded, here goes. . . . Once upon a time—"

"Don't be so corny," said Leo. "Start over."

"Okay," said Pat. "Many millions of years ago in this here jungle . . ."

"Ungrammatical," said Leo. "This here' is bad English. Commence again."

"Yes, your Majesty," said Pat, with a twinkle in his eye. "I see you know your stuff. Anyhow, the event in question occurred quite a while back. In those olden days nobody, but nobody, was King of the Jungle. But one time things started to pop!"

"There was quite a drought that year—it hadn't rained all summer. There wasn't a drop of water to drink for thousands of miles around, except in our own Deep Pool. And that was getting mighty shallow.

"All the animals came to drink here, and you never saw such confusion, such pushing and shoving around in your life! Finally, it got so bad that something had to be done, but quick. The wiser, older heads decided to hold an election and make somebody King. He would be the Big Boss, and everybody would have to follow his orders and directions. So they held an election, but it wasn't any good. Everybody voted for himself!

Then they decided that the King should have a loud voice, so that he could make his orders heard. So they held a contest—the one who could holler the loudest would be King. The contest finally narrowed down to two animals—Lester Lion (Leo's ancestor) and Caspar Elephant (a distant relative of our Elmer). And Caspar won easily. Compared to his trumpeting, Lester's roars were only a cat's whisper. So, as consolation, they made Lester Lion VICE-KING, and crowned Caspar Elephant CASPAR THE FIRST.

"And the Last. Because the next day he was fired for being too easygoing and wishy-washy. Naturally, there wasn't anything to do but promote Lester to the office of King of the Jungle. Just as they were putting the crown on his head, it started to rain. Everybody got soaked, the pools and brooks filled up again, all the animals went home, and Lester Lion was out of a job. He and his descendants haven't had a thing to do ever since.

"That's how the Lion became the King of the Jungle," concluded Pat Parrot.

"Sort of honorary," said Leo Lion. "Like being Queen of the May."
